Giving circles have received attention from community foundations and other public funders for their capacity to reach a broad range of donors, flexible and authentic appeal for donor engagement, and democratic approach to building a culture of philanthropy. But what does the giving circle—host relationship look like, and what benefits and challenges exist for hosts?

A new study by the Collective Giving Research Group and supported by the Women’s Philanthropy Institute explores giving circle hosting. Here’s what it found:

DYNAMICS OF HOSTING

Giving Circles and Collective Giving Groups

HOST ORGANIZATIONS

expect and realize significant benefits by supporting giving circles.

- Contributing to a culture of philanthropy in their communities: 92%
- Reaching new donors: 81%
- Attracting a more diverse set of donors: 74%
- Increasing community visibility: 70%

The most COMMON SERVICES

hosts offer giving circles:

- Serving as a fiscal sponsor
- Providing communications support
- Organizing educational opportunities for members
- Soliciting proposals from potential grantees.

BIGGEST CHALLENGES

associated with hosting giving circles:

- Staff time required
- Differences in expectations between the giving circle and host
- Costs
